Additional Notes:

Fun Fact: King Richard II and Henry IV were cousins who grew up and played together. They were both inducted into the Order of the Garter in 1377. However, the relationship between the two soured after Henry participated in the Lords Appellants' rebellion that was the first major attempt to reign in Richard's power. They patched things up afterwards, but after Henry agreed to fight a duel against Thomas de Mowbray, the 1st Duke of Norfolk, Richard chose to banish Henry to prevent bloodshed. Things got worse after Richard effectively cancelled Henry's inheritance and required Henry to ask Richard for the property. Henry returned from exile while Richard was on a military campaign in Ireland and quickly amassed enough power to depose Richard.

Additional Notes:

Fun Fact: Henry features in three of Shakespeare's plays, Richard II, Henry IV, Part 1, and Henry IV, Part 2. Over the course of the plays, he usurps the crown from Richard but has a hard reign due to constant rebellions and bad behavior of his son, the future Henry V. Much of Part 2 is dedicated to a coming-of-age story for Prince Hal that sees him grow into the king he will become.

Fun Fact: Henry was the first monarch to sign off on burning at the stake as a punishment. He did so on the advice of Thomas Arundel, the Archbishop of Canterbury. Henry and Arundel had met while both were in exile due to Richard. Arundel encouraged Henry to adopt this type of execution to put down the Lollard Movement, which was regarded as heresy against the Catholic Church. In 1410, John Badby became the first layman convicted of heresy and executed by burning.
